The Buddha in the Attic

John M. Edelman

They were told, and that was it. They were never heard from again. The place was just another airport, another concentration camp, another Elysian Place. It was a place where people were sent to be "resettled." It was a place where people were tortured and murdered. It was a place where people were forced to work in conditions that were inhumane. It was a place where people were denied basic human rights.

The people who were sent there were not criminals. They were not terrorists. They were not spies. They were not anything. They were simply people who were considered to be enemies of the state.

The place they were sent to was called the "internment camp." It was a place where people were held for indefinite periods of time. It was a place where people were subjected to harsh conditions. It was a place where people were denied basic human rights.

The people who were sent there were not criminals. They were not terrorists. They were not spies. They were not anything. They were simply people who were considered to be enemies of the state.

The place they were sent to was called the "internment camp." It was a place where people were held for indefinite periods of time. It was a place where people were subjected to harsh conditions. It was a place where people were denied basic human rights.

The people who were sent there were not criminals. They were not terrorists. They were not spies. They were not anything. They were simply people who were considered to be enemies of the state.